upon by some competent engineering in England. It would not be possible get an engineer out except with the promise a permanent appointment, and even then a first-class man would be likely to come.
 There would be no difficulty, and there would be comparatively very little expense sending home the report accompanied by a few additional plans or memoranda that may be thought desirable, and substituting the whole case for consideration of two or three of the most important hydraulic engineers. Of course, this would be so satisfactory as having the ground personally inspected by some one familiar with the construction of waterworks, and who had been practically engaged in connection with it. But it would be well worth all it would cost, and it would be a check on grave blunders. There are many points connected with the scheme on which an engineer might pronounce an opinion without further information than is afforded in the evidence and the reports.
 There are large sums of money to be spent, it is of the utmost importance, before beginning.
 To feel as sure of the ground as possible. In such cases nothing is so well worth having as the knowledge which comes of a combination of the highest skill with the largest experience.
 It is cheap at any price likely to be paid for it, and the most costly blunder we can make is to do without the help we might easily purchase.

Our training is proceeding at a rapid pace in Victoria. There are at present six hundred pupils receiving instruction in design. It may be supposed that this movement is in consultation with the British Library, the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and the Government is not so. It did not originate in any government department, not even the Technological; but the Technological department has recognised the attempt to generate a taste for amongst the people, and has made the by encouraging contribution of twenty pounds its funds. No, the artisans have the merit desiring to raise the standard of taste amongst themselves, and establish it upon finite principles. It is they who have proposed the Artisans' School of Design at Melbourne, and the school has sprung five or six miles elsewhere in the country, and is now so much accustomed to the practice which generally prevails in these colonies of soliciting Government aid for funds to carry out such affairs this, that it is quite refreshing to behold a little study independence amongst a class of the community sometimes thought to have not too much of the same. The house painters and decorators have done themselves great credit in refusing to wait for the initiation of Government in this matter. The school of Design had long been organised, but since it did not come from they would wait no longer; and probably, in recommending in this spirited manner to help themselves, have drawn a larger following round them than would have been attracted by a purely Government movement. The schools thus established will not be allowed stand alone; they will be subsidised with public money, and will become eventually public Schools of Design; but while thus identified with the Government, their origin will not be forgotten.

We are acquainted with the motives those who commenced the Artisans' School of Design. They may have contemplated the subject from one or two points of view, or from both. It may be that there is a strong demand for a style of work in which a knowledge of the principles that regulate grace of design and harmony of colour are required, and that too great a difference is observable between the productions of the colonial workman and the European workman, when they are annually dilt into more direct competition. This is the commercial aspect of the question. Or it may be, that a desire prevails amongst the artisans to become better makers of their art subsidiary to something better, and to find the medium for the conveyance of purer sentiment and nobler feelings—this, of course, is the moral aspect of the question. Doubtless, the motives derived from the commercial view were the most powerful. All workmen would acknowledge their influence, necessarily having thickened their senses on the selfish side.
 The same stimulus is being applied to colonial as to the home workmen, and as an engineer and the electrician are bringing us daily nearer to the great workshops of the world, the colonial workman feels here. So long as the material, no effect is perceptible; but when they become competitors in the same branches of art with their European brethren they must have recourse to the same species of training by which the achievements of the are performed. Therefore, if the artificer of Victoria or New South Wales desires to catch his wares with those of Europe or America must apply himself to principles, and excellence through the diligent study and skilful application of them. To neglect what is termed the "art" of the branch he is to fall totally behind the game of skill. The passion for the profuse ornament, unless he have the sense, or an intuitive perception of proportion, must acquire a knowledge of the rules which govern the combinations on which it depends, he will never satisfy the growing demand.
 Surely no one who has bestowed much thought upon the subject will deny that there an advantage to a people in being surrounded by objects of beauty; and that, within reasonable limits, all men are better and happier for cultivating or identifying the sense of the beautiful. We cannot but be glad to say that almost if we specific for vice, but it will be safe to consider an antidote for the most degrading forms of vice. It is no argument against beauty of work that a man who is brought up to forget its evidences denies its power by attempting to gratify his lusts. His mind is as insensible to the influences that ray in buildings, statuary, and artistic gardens, the eyes of the goats which crop the grass on the ruins of the Temple of Vespasian, as the beauty of the remaining fragments. The man must be allowed to feel the centre the more it will exalt and elevate his heart before the visible effects will appear in his conduct.
 It is true that a man who is imbued with the sense of beauty in nature and art, may still be long way from comprehending the mind of Great Source of Good; still his approach it, his attempt to ascend to it, must refine and elevate his own nature. Whatever is beautiful is so far good. To love and admire beauty is, therefore, to love and admire goodness; and therefore the man whose heart lights in the beautiful is so much the better

But this taste for the beautiful, in those whose desire or whose business it is to gratify popular demand, is only attainable through rational cultivation. The discipline of the school is necessary to it, and this is what is attempted in Melbourne and in Geelong at the present time in a private way. The thing given is gratuitous, and the subjects
